Keywords: participatory action research, primary care, mutual participation

SUMMARY

Background: The aim of the article is to share the findings of participatory action research performed to develop a mutual participatory doctor-patient relationship model, and to apply this model in a rural cross-cultural primary care setting.

Method: Participatory action research was performed with four patient groups. Four patients with incurable illnesses formed groups with their family members and significant others. Seven monthly meetings with each group were audio recorded. The question asked at each meeting was "How can the group work together to achieve the best possible health outcome for the patient?". The recorded interviews were transcribed and translated from the local vernacular (Tsonga) into English. Themes were identified from the transcripts, field notes and a reflective diary. A list of combined themes was compiled and a model was constructed to depict the themes and their interrelatedness. The model was interpreted and conclusions were drawn.

Results: To apply a mutual participatory model in a rural cross-cultural practice, the physician is required to operate from certain basic tenets. The patients have to participate actively to benefit optimally, and basic interviewing techniques are helpful to facilitate mutual participation.

Conclusions: It is not easy to implement a mutual participatory model in a disadvantaged, rural practice, but it is possible. We need a paradigm shift in health care, from "helping" patients (which may nurture dependence), towards facilitating the personal growth and development of patients (to nurture self-reliance).

INTRODUCTION AND BACKGROUND

Different models of participation in the doctor-patient relationship have been described in the past. Szasz and Hollender's models are well known and include the activity-passivity model, the guidance-cooperation model and the mutual participation model.¹ Mutual participation as the basis of the doctor-patient relationship has been the ideal for many years and is recommended by many role models in family medicine and primary care.^{1,2}

Another way to look at mutual participation is to see the doctor-patient relationship as a partnership.³ In terms of this partnership, the doctor and patient share decision making and responsibilities.⁴ In contrast to the mutual participatory model is the activity-passivity model (or non-participation), according to which the clinician gives the instructions and the patient only has to comply.¹

The literature now supports a link between patient participation and improved health outcomes.^{5,6,7,8,9} Laine even argues that, as physicians, we are ethically bound to use this model because of its positive effects on health outcomes.¹⁰ Other concepts that are linked to improved health outcomes are self-care, self-sufficiency and the patients' ability to take responsibility for their own health care, to participate in health activities and to see themselves as partners in the therapy.^{3,9,11,12} This explains why primary care workers should actively apply mutual participation when working with patients.

I work in a remote health centre in the Greater Tzaneen Municipality of the Limpopo Province of South Africa. I want to share the results of a research project in which I participated in this rural area. I asked four of my regular patients with serious incurable illnesses to participate. The aim of the study was to develop a mutual participatory doctor-patient relationship model, and to learn how
