

HE reached London in 1887, and took, joyously, to a poverty no young writer of today would have the courage or quixotry to endure. Among the several good reasons for re-reading his Henry Maitland is to catch in it the last echo in our literature of the spirit of the goliards, those "ribald clerks" and wandering scholars of the 12th and 13th centuries. The pains, actual, not figurative, of cold and hunger were the price Morley Roberts and his friends expected to have to pay for their freedom to write or paint, and they paid it carelessly. "My peculiarly squalid existence", he calls it, and adds: "In a sense it was, no doubt, squalid, and yet in another it was perhaps the greatest time in my life, and Maitland knew it. In the little book in which I kept my expenses he came across one day on which I had absolutely spent nothing. This was a great treat for him." Maitland (Gissing) chanting Greek tragedies in his poor room, Roberts trying to keep his expenditure on food down to three-and-sixpence a week ("one week it actually totalled no more than one-and-elevenpence"), the friends he calls A. D. Mack and Frank Wynne (A. D. McCormick and Frank Brangwyn) and the rest, painting away in their unheated studios, goliards all, belong to a vanished age of ignorance, of moral and intellectual naivete and freedom. I do not say that near-starvation made better writers of Roberts or Gissing. Certainly Roberts might have written less and a great deal better if he had been cushioned by a private income or a supplementary job in the B.B.C., or niched himself in the cultural Establishment, infinitely less money in his day. But I can guess what, given the choice between comfort and the greatest possible freedom, he would have taken. ". . . we made fun together of our squalor, and rejoiced in our poverty, so long as it did not mean acute suffering; and when it did mean that, we often got something out of literature to help us to forget. On looking back, I know that many things happened that now seem to me dreadful, but then they appeared but part of the day's work."

He was now determined to earn his living as a writer, only as a writer. During the next nine years, from his return until 1896, he published, as well as The Winters Acre (1887), six novels, six volumes of short stories, another volume of reminiscences, Land-Travel and Sea-Faring (1891), and a volume of poems, Songs of Energy (1891). These years set the pattern of his writing life. He wrote far too much. "I write with a certain amount of ease," he says in Henry Maitland. "It may, indeed, be difficult enough
