

10 ROCK FOUNDATIONS

10.1 Foundations on rock

When founding structures on rock, it is often assumed that the rock mass is of such high strength that it is completely safe to found anything on the rock surface. This is obviously true when compared to most soil foundations — however, foundation of e.g. bridges or hydropower dams always result in an increased load on the rock mass. The load usually comes from the dead weight of the construction and can, in particular for weaker rocks, lead to bearing capacity failure. For hydropower dam construction, the load can be very large and exceed the strength also for hard and strong rock. In this Chapter, some examples of rock foundations are described and guidelines for the design of rock foundations are given. The presentation is largely based on Wylie (1992).

Rock foundations can be defined as any case when an external load is acting on a free rock surface. The most common case is when the load is acting directly on the ground surface of daylighting rock, or on the rock surface located below a layer of soil (e.g. when piling to solid rock). Different types of foundations on rock are shown in Figure 10.1.

Perhaps the most common type of foundation is the placement of spread footings directly on a rock surface. Both the bearing capacity of the rock and the risk for unacceptable settlements must be considered in the design. For footings located in or near rock slopes, for example at bridge constructions, the stability of the overall slope must also be considered (Figure 10.1 a).

Dam construction often results in inclined external loads on the rock mass, as shown in Figure 10.1 b). This is caused by the horizontal water pressure acting on the dam in combination with the weight of the dam. The water pressure also results in a reduction of the effective stress and, hence, a reduction in rock mass strength. There is also a need for a high level of safety for dam constructions since the consequences of a potential failure often are catastrophic.
