

the historical aspects. The scope of the book is thorough in terms of the disorders considered which include cycloid, paranoid, reactive, and schizophriform psychoses, in addition to the more common functional disorders. The text is also comprehensive in its discussion of diagnostic criteria; among those reviewed are the Vienna, French, and those of historical interest, as well as the other influential diagnostic systems which will be more familiar to UK readers.

Although the advantages/disadvantages and major applications of the various diagnostic criteria, as well as the differences between them, are considered in detail, there is only cursory attention paid to reliability and validity studies.

At the outset, the authors state that they aim to "offer a comprehensive view of the present state of diagnostic formulations and to encourage greater involvement in a polydiagnostic approach". While the first aim is achieved, only one brief section of the introductory chapter deals with polydiagnostic criteria and does so largely through the use of unsubstantiated opinion.

The book is dry reading and would be incomprehensible to those without a reasonable background in this area, but would be of value as a reference text in psychiatric libraries for those with a research interest.

C. BALLARD, Lecturer in Psychiatry, University of Birmingham, Queen Elizabeth Psychiatric Hospital, Birmingham

Dictionary of Forensic Psychology. By L. R. C. HOWARD. Chichester: Barry Rose. 1990. 140 pp. £17.50.

This is a useful and comprehensive dictionary which covers most of the forensic psychiatric terms. As such, it is a useful reference for trainee psychiatrists and may well be of some use to lawyers, particularly its sections regarding psychiatric terms.

I always find it rather difficult to understand who exactly uses a dictionary of this type among those who are routinely involved in forensic psychiatric practice. Although this dictionary is comprehensive and the entries appear to be well referenced, the brief synopses of key concepts, for example, dangerousness, are unlikely to be of utility to practitioners in this area. The references, however, will assist inexperienced individuals in finding appropriate reading matter relevant to the entry. The various entries which I have reviewed appear to be thorough and comprehensive, although naturally, within such a text, room for detail is limited. The entry for rape, for example, defines the subject clearly and there are useful prevalence figures. There is, unfortunately, a focus upon the act itself and little about the victim. The section on post-traumatic neurosis is now rather out of date and there is no specific entry for post-traumatic stress disorder, about which an increasing body of both legal precedent and psychiatric knowledge is available. Similarly, the entry for behaviour therapy is, while accurate, rather limited. I am unable to comment on the legal terms as I do not have legal training.

This is a book which is useful for reference for people who are new to the field of forensic psychiatry. As such, it would perform a useful addition to a library for trainees.

PETER L. JENKINS, Consultant Psychiatrist, St Cadoc's Hospital, Cardross, Gwent

Management Training for Psychiatrists. Edited by D. BEXONA and A. BURRO. London: Gaskell, 1992. 260 pp. £15.00.

Consultant psychiatrists who have been in post for some years might approach this book with some misgivings. This would be a great pity, as there is a considerable amount of very useful information and guidance set out, not only for the newcomer (for whom it should be essential reading), but also for those who have worked in the National Health Service (NHS) for many years.

Many well known names have contributed to this book. The first half sets out a précis of the history of the NHS, examines management issues looked at from a psychiatric point of view, and attempts to come to terms with allocation and rationing of a service where demand will always outstrip resources. It draws the reader's attention to the problems of management while accepting that doctors will always put an individual patient before the needs of a wider group. It explains the need for accountability, clinical reasoning, enforced competition, and audit, stressing the need for psychiatrists to be involved actively in developing and improving the services.

Little gems are found throughout; for example explaining grades of medical and nursing manpower, and sensible precautions for domiciliary and prison visits.

Minor criticisms would be the lack of suggestions of how to equate the needs of a single patient against the masses, of comparison with health expenditure in other countries, of mention of guarantees from hostels (as distinct from hospitals) on acceptance of a patient's return after successful hospital treatment, and discussion of how the necessity of receiving 'written permission' from a patient before divulging information to Social Services equates with joint working practices.

The second half of the book deals with practical issues. "Patient management" is especially helpful. All chairmen should study the seven 'Cs' before taking up their position, and the analogy of jobs and courtship is particularly apt. Perhaps 'change-management' sounds as if nothing good from the past should be retained. I would have liked the 'additional problems' of women
