Initiatives: Application Architecture, Development, Integration and Platforms

Application leaders are mired in escalations due to open-source software security vulnerabilities and licensing risks. They should mandate the use of software composition analysis tools to detect and remediate risks early and continuously throughout the software development life cycle.

Overview

Key Challenges

- Development teams do not have the necessary security and legal expertise to recognize nor resolve serious issues while experts who do, often, do not have visibility or the access they need to help.
- Application development leaders do not enforce software composition analysis (SCA) usage continuously in the development life cycle, resulting in serious open-source software (OSS) vulnerabilities and license violations slipping into production.
- The frequency of escalations from complex OSS risks late in the development cycle and a lack of remediation knowledge can cause major disruption to the development team's workflow and morale.

Recommendations

Application leaders responsible for architecture, development, integration and platforms should:

- Enlist the help of security and legal peers by co-creating pragmatic risk policies, choosing a SCA toolkit together, enabling transparent communications and information access, and helping them with team capacity issues.
- Ensure continuous application of SCA by budgeting for tooling, providing safe-use training for OSS and enforcing mandatory execution of SCA.
- Minimize disruption of development workflows by ensuring early detection of problems; close collaboration among development, security and legal teams to resolve issues quickly; and centralizing SCA activities.
