Abstract. Cerebellar Mutism Syndrome (CMS), also known as posterior fossa syndrome (CMS/PFS), refers to a transient loss of speech followed by dysarthria and is a common complication in the pediatric population following resection of a cerebellar tumor. Recognition and rehabilitation of CMS is critical in the post-operative phases of recovery.

Two case studies, including neuropsychological assessments, along with the family and patient's perspectives are reviewed.

Keywords: Cerebellar mutism, posterior fossa syndrome, child brain tumour, rehabilitation, neuropsychological evaluation

1. Introduction

Cerebellar Mutism Syndrome (CMS), also known as posterior fossa syndrome (CMS/PFS), refers to a transient loss of speech followed by dysarthria and is a common complication in the pediatric population following resection of cerebellar tumor. With an incidence as high as 29%, CMS is characterized by delayed onset (1–6 days) and limited duration (1 day–4 months) [1]. Classically, the patient is well immediately after the operation (see cases histories 1 and 2), speaking and moving all limbs in a coordinated fashion. With the onset of CMS/PFS, the patient may experience cardinal signs of reduced speech, ataxia, and hypotonia. Other associated signs may include emotional lability, dysregulation of mouth movements, long tract signs, and cranial nerve palsies, suggesting localized cerebellar and brainstem injury.

CMS/PFS's impact upon emotional and behavioural functions has justified an extension of the role of the cerebellum beyond physical coordination, proposing links to higher cortical function indicating the cerebellum's role in complex circuitry. Impairments in executive functioning linked to planning, set-shifting, verbal fluency, abstract reasoning and working memory have been described in relation to CMS/PFS in the adult and paediatric patient populations as cerebellar cognitive affective syndrome (CAS). Patients with this associated syndrome have reported difficulties with visuo-spatial organization and memory, personality change with blunting of affect or disinhibited and inappropriate behaviour, and language deficits including agrammatism and dysprosodia [2,3].

2. Rehabilitative progress

There is no established treatment for CMS to date, though speech therapy may be helpful in monitoring
