

The two aspects of human nature that great poets catch hold of are those that are common, but often neglected, things: an unheroic life, but a humanity beneath the hero's helmet. In David Copperfield, Dickens had been helped, as Turgenev put it, by the "Russian" who was looking at him from the inside. Dickens had been looking at him from the outside, and with his characteristic power he had made up the story and with his characteristic power he had made it real. It is hard to say whether Dickens was a poet, but he was a poet.
