

THE THREAT OF BIOTERRORISM AND THE PUBLIC HEALTH RESPONSE: SUMMARY OF THE JOHNS HOPKINS NATIONAL SYMPOSIUM ON MEDICAL AND PUBLIC HEALTH RESPONSE TO BIOTERRORISM

Richard W. Gilpin, PhD, RBP, CBSP
The Johns Hopkins University and Hospital
Baltimore, Maryland

As the world has grown smaller and more sophisticated, the tenets of biosafety and public health have become increasingly important. In this new age, terrorists have begun to use biologicals as a weapon, i.e., biological terrorism or the use of infectious microorganisms to dominate or coerce by intimidation, or to cause fear.

The increasing importance of bioterrorism was recently noted by Darcy Bender of the Council on Foreign Relations, Washington, DC, who described that 47 anthrax hoaxes and threats have occurred in the United States between 1992 and mid-February 1999. The majority of these incidents were not noted by either the electronic or print media.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) has responded to these incidents by publishing response guidelines to these threats (CDC, 1999) in a report in the Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report (MMWR) entitled Bioterrorism Alleging Use of Anthrax and Interim Guidelines for Management - United States, 1998. This article supplemented an earlier paper by Kaufmann and co-workers (Kaufmann, et al., 1997) who provided economic justification for developing preparedness programs to bioterrorist incidents and discussed the impact of three biological warfare agents.

This rise in interest in bioterrorism was reflected by the one thousand people who registered to attend the Johns Hopkins National Symposium on Medical and Public Health Response to Bioterrorism in February, 1999. Attendees came from many walks of life; biological safety professionals, emergency response experts, health care providers, hospital administrators, government officials, hospital epidemiologists, intelligence experts, law enforcement officials, microbiologists, military experts, nurses, physicians, public health officials, public policy analysts, and of course the media. The Johns Hopkins University Center for Civilian Biodefense Studies sponsored this symposium in association with the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, the Infectious Diseases Society of America, and the American Society for Microbiology. Co-sponsors were the American College of Preventative Medicine, the Association of Public Health Laboratories, the Association of Schools of Public Health, the Association of State and Territorial Health Officials, the Commissioned Officers Association of the U.S. Public Health Service, the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists, the National Association of County and City Health Officials, the National Association of Local Boards of Health, the Partnership for Prevention, the Public Health Foundation, and the Society of Healthcare Epidemiologists of America. Proceedings of the symposium are netcast at the Johns Hopkins Civilian Biodefense website:

<http://www.hopkins-biodefense.org>.

Reality of the Threat

D. A. Henderson, Director of the Johns Hopkins Center for Civilian Biodefense Studies, began the symposium by introducing the keynote speaker, Ms. Donna Shalala, Secretary of Health and Human Services. Ms. Shalala noted that public health and medical personnel are the lead groups in responding to bioterrorism incidents. Additionally, she discussed the Administration's commitment to providing financial and personnel resources to assist in developing response plans.

David Siegrist, Potomac Institute for Policy Studies, pointed out that the presence of vulnerable targets and the willingness of terrorists to use biological weapons has obviously heightened concerns about bioterrorism. He further described biological weapon caches that had been left by the allied forces at the conclusion of operation Desert Storm due to fears that destruction of these weapons could cause collateral damage (civilian casualties).
