

Placing Ireland in a Comparative Perspective

MICHEL PEILLON
Maynooth College

Abstract: Some recent publications have raised the question of placing Ireland in a comparative perspective. Three such comparative frameworks are investigated in this paper: advanced capitalist countries, (West)European countries, and finally semi-peripheral European societies. Although not an advanced capitalist economy, Ireland displays the central institutional features of such societies. But on closer inspection, it seems that such features can be attributed to a European institutional framework, rather than to advanced capitalism as such. Furthermore, Ireland is located, in economic terms, in broadly the same position as countries such as Greece, Portugal and Spain. But it has very little in common with them in terms of socio-political characteristics. Ireland provides in that sense a striking illustration of the disjunction which may emerge between a process of capitalist development and institutional development.

I INTRODUCTION

Recent publications have sought to place Ireland in a comparative perspective. The whole debate on the nature of Irish political life has already focused attention on the type of political system Ireland should be compared to (Mair, 1987). In her study of pay determination in Ireland, Niamh Hardiman (1987) wonders why Ireland has not followed the path of other small European countries towards a stable corporatist arrangement. She asserts that the requirements of competitiveness in an open economy are better satisfied with such corporatist agreements. Joseph Lee (1989) seeks to explain why Ireland, unlike the other small countries in Europe which have found themselves in a similar situation, has not succeeded in its effort to modernise and industrialise. The study of Irish society by Breen et al. (1990) concludes that, in the way the state contributes to the shaping of society, Ireland has a great deal in common with countries such as Greece, and possibly the European periphery as a whole.
