Prayer, Pretense, and Personification becomes real, with Tanya Luhmann

Over one hundred years ago, William James dedicated an entire chapter in Unseen. When we typically imagine religion, we imagine that religion has to do with cannot-see, taste, smell, or touch. James characterized the relationship of the individual psyche and belief in the supernatural realm as "...if there were in the human consciousness a sense of reality, (1985, p. 55 [emphasis in original]).

While the impulse to believe may be there, one's relationship to this unseen realm is not easy to cultivate and maintain. Our evolved psychology was not "built" with the intuition that, even though we have no direct access, there is an unseen—ultimate reality—that has access to our ownard shares thoughts with us (Boyer, 2013). Such ideas require cultural scaffolding and are not easily sustained in the absence of social systems. Although often ignored, "all our ethnography and history suggests that there is learning involved in the practice of religion..." (Luhmann, 2013, p. 147). How does one learn to experience God as person?

Podcast: Play in new window | Download

In her interview with Thomas Coleman, psychological-anthropologist Tanya Luhmann discusses her multiyear ethnography of American evangelicals where she sought to understand how some of these individuals come to have close, personal, intimate relationships with God (Luhmann, 2012). She begins by providing the background into her extensive research on the Vineyard Church movement, where she attended sermons, house groups, prayer groups, and many other opportunities to understand evangelicals, specifically, how God becomes real for them. Luhmann details the rise of evangelicals in the 60's and 70's, and how anthropological work can be informed by evolutionary psychology. This serves as a framework to understand the unique training processes that teach an individual that their mind is not only open to their own thoughts, but God's as well. Luhmann goes beyond a purely explanatory endeavor and is interested in understanding the processes that lead some to see God as "a person among people". One aspect of this learning process, she found, involves pretense and instructs the individual to treat God as an imaginary friend, but without caveat—God (to them) is real and imaginary friends are not.

Furthermore, while talking to God, Luhmann uncovered that the individual is often instructed to treat God as they would another person, like a close friend you tell your secrets to. This helps to cultivate a misunderstanding experience of God that is highly anthropomorphic and cognitively pleasing rather than thinking of God as Aristotle's "unmoved mover", who would hardly be interested in your innermost thoughts. Including she details some of the prayer exercises that further help individuals to develop this personal sense of divine presence and answers an RSP listener's question about the possibility of gender differences in experiencing the divine.
