

- The Department of Labor would establish national target group priorities, but local officials would be able to adapt these to their unique local population and problems;
- There would be an application and approval process through which state and local officials would establish their performance objectives and make public their plans and progress;
- Coordination with other separately legislated manpower activities, such as the Work Incentive Program (WIN) and the employment service, would be encouraged.

I indicated to the Committee that these basic principles were now being embodied in proposed regulations and guidelines, that they were entirely consistent with the legal requirements of the MDTA and the EOA, and that we intended to move in a controlled and phased fashion to implement this program, working through state and local officials.

My testimony praised S1559 in general but outlined some of the specific problems that we saw in the legislation, such as the continuation of a number of categorical programs and the inclusion of specific funding for community action agencies.

In the ensuing questioning by the Committee, Senators Nelson and Javits stated their positions on several important issues that, in retrospect, were important portents of their actions over the coming months. In responding to my criticism of the Committee bill for being overly categorized, Senator Nelson first emphasized his 15-year commitment to returning responsibility for manpower programs to state governments:

...we ought to return to the state and local governments every single function performed by the federal government that can, in fact, be performed effectively at the local level.

It is an administrative bureaucratic monstrosity down here in Washington and we just do more damage to the country through the bureaucracy than you would have as a consequence of the various varieties of incompetence or corruption that you will, from time to time, find in the state and cities.

and then stated his view of categorization: that the bill already named a category, "poor people," so all the Committee was asking for was a program that also took into
