Female genital organs

Development of the fetus in the womb

Fetal development is a gradual process. In certain weeks, specific body organs or parts develop. At 10 weeks, facial features have formed. At 15 weeks, the organs have developed. By week 20 the fetus is active, and movements are easily felt. By 28 weeks most of the organ systems become ready to function normally. At 32 weeks the growth rate has slowed down but weight has markedly increased. At 40 weeks, the fetus weighs 3.5 pounds (1.6 kilograms) and is ready for birth.

The delivery process

At about four weeks after ovulation or in a few weeks (usually) until sometime before delivery, the fetus head positions at the opening of the uterus.

The uterus muscles contract irregularly and with varying frequency. These contractions bend the fetal membranes and the rapid moving uterus has other parts out. The baby is pushed outside.

The cervix of the uterus dilates to about 10 cm to facilitate the exit of the fetus. Contractions are intermittent and growing in strength.

In a normal delivery, the head of the fetus enters first. If the mother is not fully dilated, it is necessary to ensure the pelvis is not too narrow.

After the head is outside, the baby's body comes and exits. The birth of the baby, as well as all the other of this process, is variable.

Since the baby is outside the mother's womb, the baby is still attached to the placenta. The umbilical cord, which runs to the baby, is cut. The placenta, along with the remaining blood, are inside the maternal womb.
