S. Marine Corps, 2011-10-03 When an infantry unit is not actively fighting the enemy it should be actively searching for the enemy which is the primary purpose of scouting The unit attempts to keep the enemy off balance while making preparations for further attacks Physically locating and keeping the enemy off balance are normally accomplished by small units ranging from a two-person scouting party to a squad size patrol Infantrymen are sent out as scouts or as members of a patrol because the commander needs information about the enemy terrain and the location of friendly troops The lives of the entire unit may depend upon the success or failure of a scout or patrol and the accuracy and timeliness of the report The success of the scout or patrol will depend upon their training preparation by the commander and understanding their mission and the commander's requirements To wage combat successfully a commander must have accurate detailed and timely information about the enemy the terrain and adjacent friendly units Well trained scouts and capably led patrols are among the most effective means the commander has for acquiring the information necessary to plan tactical actions and make decisions in execution
