

➤ La résistance aux frictions mécaniques répétées que subit la peau est en partie assurée par un réseau protéique filamentueux supracellulaire composé de kératines. Le rôle structural de ces protéines, indispensable à la cohésion et à l'intégrité des tissus épithéliaux, a été confirmé ces dernières années par la caractérisation d'un nombre croissant de maladies dues à des mutations localisées au niveau de leurs gènes. Récemment, des travaux portant sur la cicatrisation et le développement embryonnaire de la peau ont permis d'apporter un éclairage nouveau sur la fonction de ces protéines. Loin de jouer uniquement un rôle cyto-architectural, elles pourraient avoir une fonction beaucoup plus subtile en participant à la différenciation des épithéliums. Ainsi, l'étude des kératines, et en particulier des kératines K6, K16 et K17, est en passe de changer significativement notre regard sur la biologie de la peau.

Avec une surface d'environ 2 m² et un poids moyen représentant 15 % de celui d'un adulte, la peau est l'organe le plus important du corps humain. Elle est composée de deux principaux tissus, l'épiderme, qui siège à l'extérieur, et un tissu conjonctif qui comporte le derme et l'hypoderme. Sa destruction ou son altération a des conséquences extrêmement graves pour l'organisme, pouvant rapidement entraîner la mort. Il s'agit donc d'un organe vital agissant comme une véritable barrière face aux agressions chimiques ou à l'entrée de micro-organismes. C'est l'épiderme, un épithélium stratifié hautement spécialisé, localisé à la surface de la peau, qui assure l'essentiel de la fonction protectrice [1]. Cela est rendu possible grâce à la structure particulière de ce tissu composé principalement de kératinocytes. Ces cellules sont disposées en quatre couches qui sont (de la profondeur vers la surface) les cellules basales, les cellules épineuses, les cellules granuleuses et les cellules mortes de la couche cornée (Figure 1A). Cette couche superficielle est constituée d'un amas de cellules très aplaties dépourvues de noyau et d'organites : les cornéocytes. Ces cellules desquamant à la surface de la peau et doivent être continuellement remplacées.

L'épiderme est donc un tissu qui se renouvelle constamment et où le taux de cellules perdues à la surface est contrebalancé par le taux de cellules produites au niveau de la couche basale, unique couche composée de kératinocytes mitotiquement actifs [1]. Sous l'effet de signaux encore mal définis, les kératinocytes basaux entrent dans un processus de différenciation, commencent leur migration vers la surface et acquièrent progressivement les caractéristiques structurales et fonctionnelles des cornéocytes [2]. La fonction de barrière de l'épiderme est assurée à la surface par une structure produite par les cornéocytes et appelée enveloppe cellulaire. Située contre la membrane plasmique, l'enveloppe cellulaire est composée de nombreuses protéines réticulées par des transglutaminases formant un complexe protéique macromoléculaire particulièrement stable et insoluble [3]. La protection de l'organisme est aussi assurée par la formidable cohésion cellulaire de l'épiderme qui lui permet de résister aux continuelles frictions mécaniques que subit la peau. Cette cohésion est due à la présence d'un très grand nombre de jonctions cellulaires de type jonctions adhérentes, desmosomes (interactions cellulaires/cellules) et hémidesmosomes (interactions cell-
