Arenaviruses P. B. Jahrling, C. J. Peters, ARMY MEDICAL RESEARCH INST OF INFECTIOUS DISEASES FORT DETRICK MD., 1985 The family Arenaviridae 1 is comprised of 11 or more serologically related viruses which share unique morphological and physiochemical characteristics All arenaviruses establish chronic viremias in specific mammalian hosts 2 from which these viruses are routinely isolated Table 1 The four arenaviruses which are pathogenic for humans were originally isolated from patients and subsequently from the rodent reservoirs Lymphocytic choriomeningitis virus LCMV was the first recognized member of the Arenaviridae and is thus considered the prototype Originally isolated in the course of investigating a suspected St Louis encephalitis epidemic in 1933 LCMV was soon associated with aseptic meningitis and the further association between human disease and contact with persistently infected mice was suggested. Among the arenavirus pathogens, Junin virus was the next to be isolated originally in 1959 from Argentina hemorrhagic fever (AHF) patients, followed by Machupo virus from Bolivian hemorrhagic fever (BHF) patients in 1963 and most recently Lassa virus from Lassa fever patients in Nigeria in 1969. The other arenaviruses listed in Table 1 have not been associated with naturally occurring human disease. Effective treatment regimens utilizing specific convalescent immune plasma and specialized antiviral drugs have been developed, and the need to improve the available diagnostic tools for rapid diagnosis of arenavirus infections has become acute.
