Promising Practices For Urban Reading Instruction:

Promising Practices for Urban Reading Instruction Pamela A. Mason, Jeanne Shay Schumm, 2005 As the reading profession faces the challenge of high stakes testing and standards based curricula it is essential that administrators teachers and teacher educators who plan and implement reading programs in urban settings have a professional development resource that speaks directly to urban education and diversity This collection is that resource showing what works or what has the promise of working in urban settings This collection of research based articles is framed around the International Reading Association position statement Making a Difference Means Making It Different Honoring Children s Rights to Excellent Reading Instruction which presents 10 literacy rights of every child outlining what children need to become competent readers and writers The volume includes two or three amides pertaining to each of the 10 rights an annotated bibliography of related IRA books and amides published since 1990 and a list of websites that provide additional information about promising practices in urban reading instruction Promising Practices for Urban Reading Instruction is an important step in identifying promising practices for making children s literacy rights a reality and provides direction about the next steps for educators involved in urban reading instruction
