

Gender, Schooling and Transformation: evaluating liberal feminist action in education

RONALD G. SULTANA

Faculty of Education, University of Malta

ABSTRACT This paper describes one aspect of a study carried out by the author in three secondary schools in New Zealand, where the overall goal was to critically analyse the messages about work and non-work given overtly and covertly by teachers in various areas of the curriculum. The article focuses principally on one of these schools, and on the messages given within this school regarding the choice of subjects and occupations. 'All Girls' High' was found to function as a political site involved in the construction and control of feminist discourse, meaning and subjectivity. This discourse is linked to the transformative and reproductive debate within the 'new' sociology of education, and specifically placed in a context which evaluates the effectiveness of liberal feminist discourse.

INTRODUCTION

This article draws on data from a larger study which set out to discover and critically analyse the messages about work and non-work given overtly and covertly by three high schools in a provincial city of the North Island of New Zealand. The bulk of the data collected was used in a doctoral dissertation entitled 'Schooling for Work in New Zealand: a qualitative study of three high schools' (Sultana, 1987). The focus in this particular article is on one school—referred to here under the pseudonym of 'All Girls' High School'—and on the messages given within this school regarding the choice of subjects and occupations. Reference is occasionally made to the other two schools involved in the research—'Co-Ed High' and 'All Boys' College'—in order to highlight contrasting messages communicated to students there.

The article first considers the reproduction/transformation debate in the 'new' sociology of education and relates the insights of liberal, radical and socialist feminist discourse to the transformative agenda of education. The 'Girls Can Do Anything' campaign is then located within the liberal feminist tradition and a description of the campaign at All Girls' High is provided as an example of feminist schooling within this tradition. The efforts of the school—and the reception afforded to the messages by various students—are explored in ethnographic data.
