

How Psychologists Study Social Behavior

Scientific research is a bit like detective work. A detective begins with a mystery and a set of procedures for solving that mystery: interview witnesses, look for a motive, try to rule out various suspects, examine the material evidence, and so on. There are pitfalls at every step: witnesses may lie or base their testimony on unfounded assumptions, some motives may be hidden, and the evidence may have been tampered with. Like other scientists, social psychologists begin with mysteries. We opened this chapter with several, including: What causes people to engage in unusual mob behavior, as in the swooning crowds of Sinatra fans? What causes some people to thirst for achievement, as in the case of mountain-climbing socialite Sandy Hill Pittman? Like detectives, social psychologists have a set of procedures for solving such mysteries and, like detectives, they must also be aware of certain potential pitfalls involved in using these procedures. The methods used by social psychologists can be roughly divided into two categories: descriptive and experimental. Descriptive methods involve attempts to measure or record behaviors, thoughts, or feelings in their natural state. When psychologists use descriptive methods, they hope to record behaviors without changing them in any way. Experimental methods, on the other hand, are attempts to manipulate social processes by varying some aspect of the situation. Experiments do not necessarily tell us the when and where of everyday social encounters outside the laboratory, but they help us understand and explain those encounters, answering the "why" question.

Descriptive Methods

How does one go about carefully describing social behavior? Social psychologists use five major types of descriptive methods: naturalistic observation, case studies, archives, surveys, and psychological tests.

Naturalistic Observation

Perhaps the most straightforward descriptive method is naturalistic observation. It involves, quite simply, observing behavior as it unfolds in its natural setting. As one example, Irenäus Eibl-Eibesfeldt (1975) visited numerous cultures around the world and used a hidden camera to observe women flirting with men. In another study of nonverbal communication between the sexes, psychologist Monica Moore (1985) went to a setting where she expected women to naturally show a lot of nonverbal flirtation behaviors—a singles' bar. There she found several patterns of behavior not likely to be seen in comparison settings such as a library or women's center meeting. For instance, a woman in the bar would frequently glance at a man for a few seconds, smile, flip her hair, and tilt her head at a 45-degree angle so her neck was exposed. Naturalistic observation has a number of advantages as a research method. Behavior in a natural setting is spontaneous, for example, rather than artificial and contrived. In contrast, and Social Behavior Vassilis Saroglou, 2013-07-24 Psychological interest in religion in terms of both theory and empirical research has been constant since the beginning of psychology. However, since the beginning of the 21st Century, partially due to important social and political events and developments, interest in religion within personality and social psychology has increased. This volume reviews the accumulated research and theory on the major aspects of personality and social psychology as applied to religion. It provides a high quality integrative, systematic and rigorous review of that work with a focus on topics that are both central in personality and social psychology and have allowed for the accumulation of solid and replicated and not impressionist knowledge on religion. The contributors are renowned researchers in the field who offer an international perspective that is both illuminating yet neutral with respect to religion. The volume's primary audience are academics, researchers and advanced students in social psychology, but it will also interest those in sociology, political sciences and anthropology.

Research Methods in Social Relations Geoffrey Maruyama, Carey S. Ryan, 2014-06-11
Research Methods in Social Relations 8th Edition features a series of updates and revisions in its comprehensive introduction to current research methods in the social and behavioural sciences. Offers comprehensive coverage of a wide variety of traditional and topical research methods. Addresses many newer research approaches such as propensity score matching, mixed methods designs and confirmatory factor analysis. Written to be accessible to a range of social and behavioural science disciplines including public health, political science, sociology and psychology. Includes new chapters that engage readers in critical thinking about the processes involved in building sustainable partnerships in field and community settings. The Companion website includes an array of resources for instructors including Test Banks, Power Point lecture slides, discussion questions and exercises. This new edition is the much anticipated follow up to 2001's seventh edition by Hoyle, Harris and Judd.

What Determines Social Behavior? Investigating the Role of Emotions, Self-Centered Motives, and Social Norms
Corrado Corradi-Dell'Acqua, Leonie Koban, Susanne Leiberg, Patrik Vuilleumier, Ernst Fehr, 2016-09-28 Human behavior and decision making is subject to social and motivational influences such as emotions, norms and self other regarding preferences. The identification of the neural and psychological mechanisms underlying these factors is a central issue in psychology, behavioral economics and social neuroscience with important clinical, social and even political implications. However, despite a continuously growing interest from the scientific community, the processes underlying these factors as well as their ontogenetic and phylogenetic development have so far remained elusive. In this Research Topic we collect articles that provide challenging insights and stimulate a fruitful controversy on the question of what determines social behavior. Indeed, over the last decades, research has shown that introducing a social context to otherwise abstract tasks has diverse effects on social behavior. On the one hand, it may induce individuals to act irrationally, for instance to refuse money, but on the other hand, it improves individuals' reasoning in that formerly difficult abstract problems can be easily solved. These lines of research led to distinct, although not necessarily mutually exclusive, models for socially driven behavioral changes. For instance a popular theoretical framework interprets human behavior as a result of a conflict between cognition and emotion with the cognitive system promoting self interested choices and the emotional system triggered by the social context operating against them Other theories favor social norms and deontic heuristics in biasing human reasoning and encouraging choices that are sometimes in conflict with one s interest Few studies attempted to disentangle between these as well as other models As a consequence although insightful results arise from specific domains tasks a comprehensive theoretical framework is still missing Furthermore studies employing neuroimaging techniques have begun to shed some light on the neural substrates involved in social behavior implicating consistently although not exclusively portions of the limbic system the insular and the prefrontal cortex In this context a challenge for present research lies not only in further mapping the brain structures implicated in social behavior or in describing in detail the functional interaction between these structures but in showing how the implicated networks relate to different theoretical models This is Research Topic hosted by members of the Swiss National Center of Competence in Research Affective Sciences Emotions in Individual Behaviour and Social Processes We collected contributions from the international community which extended the current knowledge about the psychological and neural structures underlying social behavior and decision making In particular we encouraged submissions from investigators arising from different domains psychology behavioral economics affective sciences etc implementing different techniques behavior electrophysiology neuroimaging brain stimulations on different populations neurotypical adults children brain damaged or psychiatric patients etc Animal studies are also included as the data reported are of high comparative value Finally we also welcomed submissions of meta analytical articles mini reviews and perspective papers which offer provocative and insightful interpretations of the recent literature in the field

Research in the Social Scientific Study of Religion, Volume 23 ,2012-05-23 The social scientific study of religion is a crucial arena of human endeavor as questions about the existence and nature of God interact with the study of religion as a human phenomenon The twenty third volume of Research in the Social Scientific Study of Religion continues the tradition of promoting extended debate of current issues in the field The special section on Theism and Non Theism in Psychological Science includes contributions from leading researchers in this area This landmark collection of papers draws on a range of perspectives that both summarize the theism debate in psychology and help to move it forward in new directions In addition the volume includes papers on other key areas in the study of religion such as spirituality and social capital
