

Introduction: Matter and Perception – Interactions between Metaphysics, Epistemology, and Natural Philosophy

While the concept of ‘matter’ has received much attention from scholars of early modern philosophy, this is not the case with ‘perception,’ and is even less so when it comes to a consideration of the relationship between the two. One reason might be the fact that by ‘perception’ we usually understand sense-perception, and we think of the empirical theory according to which we acquire knowledge about the world through our senses, when these capture the sensible qualities of external objects. But what about Leibniz’s claim that monads, simple immaterial beings, have perception, and that sensation is a more complex type of perception?<sup>1</sup> According to Leibniz, the sufficient reason of change and (mechanical) motion in the material world is to be found in the perception of monads:

Moreover, we must confess that the perception, and what depends on it, is inexplicable in terms of mechanical reasons, that is, through shape and motions. [...] Furthermore, this is all one can find in the simple substance – that is, perceptions and their changes. It is also in this alone that all the internal actions of simple substances can consist.<sup>2</sup>

For Leibniz, the mechanical interactions of material bodies will ultimately be accounted for in terms of the non-mechanical actions of simple substances, namely, the perception of monads. Perception and appetite – the monads’ tendency to go from one perception to another – are their two characteristics and the principles of change. As principles of change, they are the causes of all
