

Morality in professional practice

Jakob Cromdal and Michael Tholander

Morality is such a common and intrinsic quality of everyday social interaction that it is usually invisible to us, like glasses that provide a sharp sight of the area beyond although they themselves remain unseen. (Bergmann 1998: 280)

This special issue of the Journal of Applied Linguistics and Professional Practice presents a collection of articles that explores moral work in professional practice. In the broadest sense, the focus is on people 'doing morality' with regard to prior, and somehow problematic, events. Our goal is to illustrate how morality forms part and parcel of the work of professionals; how moral orders are drawn upon, and how they are reflexively shaped and accomplished in and through real interactional events taking place in different institutional encounters. For this reason, the studies in this special issue take an empirically sound, practice-oriented approach to morality-in-interaction.

Over the years, human morality has become a locus of much scholarly work involving a multitude of academic disciplines, theories, and methodological approaches that have generated a bulk of knowledge far too great to be reviewed here. Three general features, however, stand out in this body of academic work.

First, research into morality is very rarely based on naturally occurring data. With the exception of moral philosophy, where empirical data are largely absent, studies of moral issues typically rely on interviews, tests, and
