Abstract

Perinatal post mortems are those performed on fetuses, stillborn infants and infants who die in the neonatal period. The majority are performed following consent being obtained from the parents. Performing these cases requires special knowledge and equipment. The background to these cases and detailed information on what is undertaken and how findings are interpreted will be covered in this review.

Keywords: autopsy; fetal; neonatal; perinatal

Background

The World Health Organisation (WHO) definition of a perinatal death is one occurring from 22 weeks gestation to the end of the first week of neonatal life; there is no stipulation for weight, although 500 g or more is suggested.¹ According to this definition, more than 5 million perinatal deaths occur worldwide each year. The United Kingdom (UK) does not follow this definition; the stillbirth component is only collected from 24 weeks gestation onwards. There is no central registration for fetal demise occurring below 24 weeks gestation which makes assessment of numbers of miscarriages difficult. The Confidential Enquiry system in the UK collates information regarding late fetal demise (22 weeks onwards), stillbirth and neonatal death for the whole country; the perinatal mortality rate in 2016 was 5.64 per 1000 total births, with a stillbirth rate (deaths after 24 weeks gestation excluding live births) of 3.93 per 1000 total births. The rates for stillbirth and neonatal death in the UK are relatively high compared to similar countries.² In 2015, the WHO published a comparison table of stillbirth rates in 196 countries – using babies born at 28 weeks gestation or more, or weighing over 1000 g – which showed the UK rate being 2.9 per 1000 births.³ The range was from 1.3 per 1000 (Iceland) to 43.1 per 1000 (Pakistan). According to this, the UK was joint 23rd in the list, with many European Countries, Australia, New Zealand, Japan and the Republic of Korea having a lower stillbirth rate. Of the thirteen countries with a rate of 30 per 1000 or greater, with the exception of Pakistan, all lie in Africa.

Authority for perinatal examinations

Perinatal pathology includes post mortem examinations performed on stillborn infants and neonates but also earlier miscarriages and terminations for abnormality, in effect, from 12 weeks gestation onwards. Perinatal and paediatric pathologists also perform post mortem examinations on infants and older children, but the investigation of these cases is outside the remit of this article. The vast majority of perinatal cases are performed as a result of parental request with consent, rather than being a medicolegal requirement, although there is some variation throughout the regions of the UK.

In England and Wales, whilst HM Coroner's power to inquire into the circumstances of a death are wide ranging, they do not have the power to investigate a stillbirth. A fetus or stillborn infant is legally regarded as not achieving independent life, and therefore cannot be subject to a coronial investigation currently (this is part 1 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009⁴). The Coroner may have grounds for investigation if there is a possibility that the infant achieved independent life before dying, including concealed pregnancy or if there is a finding during the post mortem suggestive of an iatrogenic cause of death.

Coronial legislation relating to the investigation of stillbirth differs in Northern Ireland, where the Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959⁵ includes a 'fetus in utero capable of being born alive' as part of the definition of 'deceased person'; this is considered to explicitly permit the Coroner to investigate stillbirths, i.e. babies >24 weeks gestation but who are subsequently stillborn.

In Scotland, the Procurator Fiscal has powers to investigate infant deaths that occur as a sudden, unexpected and unexplained perinatal death; where the body of a new-born is found and it is unclear if the baby was live born or still born; and deaths arising following a concealed pregnancy.

Currently, there is debate about expanding the role of the Coroner in England and Wales in the investigation of stillbirth, with a Bill proceeding through parliament.⁶ This is supported by various charitable bodies including the UK Stillbirth and Neonatal Death Charity (SANDS); there may be grounds for a coronial investigation if the parental view is that hospital reviews have been inadequate or not undertaken or whether there were considered to be gaps in maternity care that could have resulted in the stillbirth.

It is important that any perinatal post mortem, regardless of the jurisdiction under which it is performed, is undertaken with understanding of the need for additional investigations, as described below.

The role of the Human Tissue Authority (HTA) is to ensure that human tissue is used safely and ethically, and with proper consent according to the Human Tissue Act 2004.⁷ The HTA regulates, through licensing, the removal, storage and use of human tissue for scheduled purposes. According to the HTA, fetuses that have not exceeded the 24th week of pregnancy are considered to be the mother's tissue as long as they have not taken breath; they have produced guidelines for the sensitive disposal of fetal tissues, although this is not legally covered by the Act itself.

In most cases, consent is required from the parents prior to performing the post mortem examination. The consent process is
