ABSTRACT

Time is a prevalent motif in Elizabethan love sonnets, presenting itself not only as natural force to be reckoned, but also as an oppositional element in humanity's constant search for immortality. Through the analysis of both Edmund Spenser's Amoretti LXXV and William Shakespeare's Sonnet XVIII I intend to explore, compare and contrast the representations of Time in their verses as well as the poets' promises of immortality through their own writings. Drawing from Horace's Odes and Ovid's Metamorphoses as referential works in the discussion of Time in poetry, I will highlight how the struggle to survive the natural passage of time and its corrosive effects while having art as medium may have inspired both Spenser and Shakespeare's efforts into building their own metonymical pieces of art. Through this work I hope to delve further into the motif of Time as a force that opposes the logic of stability and immutability often proposed by an art that promises the immortalization of one's love interest.

Keywords: English poetry, Edmund Spenser, Sonnet, time, William Shakespeare

INTRODUCTION

The corrosive effects of Time in one's object of desire is a pervading theme found in many Elizabethan Era circles of love poetry. Often in the guise of a tyrant, a thief, a devourer and even as a harvester (Kaula, 1963), Time not only is the theme of at least 22 sonnets, out of the widely-known 126 pieces written by William Shakespeare and dedicated to the Fair Youth, but it is also one of the motifs that inspired many of Edmund Spenser's pieces in Amoretti, a collection of love sonnets, similarly written in the 16th century, which describes the process of courting and, eventually, marrying Elizabeth Boyle.

If not as "a threat to beauty and to love, and potentially to everything that gives life value" (Fuller, 2011, p.60), Time, in Elizabethan sonnets, is often presented as one of nature's forces possible to be challenged either through human reproduction or through the metonymical effect of an art that immortalizes objects and subjects in and through itself. The juxtaposition of both Shakespeare's Sonnet XVIII and Spenser's Amoretti LXXV as contemporary pieces of poetry may allow us to further delve into the motif of Time as an oppositional force to the court of love in the Elizabethan era.

The poetic form that inspired both bards, as introduced by Lever (1956), came to be through elements of the Provençal lyric and the Tuscan sonnet that were appropriated by Petrarch (Francesco Petrarca, 1304–1374) in his own love sonnets. His popular sonnet form introduced a fourteen-line piece with a break after the eight line, having this first part broken into two stanzas of four lines each and a rhyme scheme of ABBA, while the last six lines were divided into two stanzas of three lines each under the rhyme scheme of CBC. This structure "proved remarkably flexible, allowing poets to express themselves in a compact and striking manner" (Punchner et. al, 2012, p.166), favoring the creative use of metaphors, similes, synecdoche, blazons and symbols as well as themes such as the unattainability of love, the passage of time, self-introspection and the idealization of the feminine figure.
