

Pity as a Moral Concept/ The Morality of Pity

FELICIA ACKERMAN

"I think it's rather an impertinence to pity people," said the Dean.

"Hear, hear!" said Harriet. "Nobody likes being pitied. Most of us enjoy self-pity, but that's another thing."

"Caustic," said Miss de Vine, "but painfully true."¹

Did you know that you're not supposed to pity a blind person? Or someone in a wheelchair or someone born without arms? The point is not the obvious one that it would be rude and presumptuous of you to intrude upon such people, by informing them while they are going about their business and possibly having a whale of a good time, that you view them as objects of pity. The point is that it is presumptuous and demeaning of you to pity them at all, even if you manage to keep your pity entirely under wraps. Who holds these views? On what grounds? Are they good grounds? This essay treats these and related questions.

The American Heritage Dictionary of the English Language defines 'pity' as "Sympathy and sorrow aroused by the misfortune or suffering of another,"² and adds that 'pity' is one of a group of nouns that "signify sympathetic, kindly concern aroused by the misfortune, affliction or suffering of another,"³ and that the word 'pity', in particular, "often implies a feeling of sorrow that inclines one to help or show mercy."⁴

Two objections arise here. First, it is not enough to say that the "sympathy and sorrow" are aroused by another's misfortune. The sympathy and sorrow must also have the unfortunate person as their object. Mary's misfortune may arouse pity in you not for Mary but for the similarly afflicted (but more poignant) Jane, but then it is Jane, not Mary, that you pity. Second, since you can pity someone for something that you wrongly take to be a misfortune or that you wrongly believe has befallen him, the word 'perceived' should be inserted before 'misfortune' in the above quoted definition.
