

Introduction: Phoenix on the waterfront

The post-war interface is widely recognised, and has been identified in the literature, as an area in transition. Geographers and economists, politicians and planners, port authorities, port users and property developers are all keenly aware of development issues relating to this interface that confront city-ports through the advanced world and, increasingly, in developing countries too. These development issues have been generated by socio-economic change in the maritime world, by evolving patterns of world trade, by new levels of environmental regulation, and by changing relationships between ports and cities.

Against this background, and given the far-reaching importance of the problems involved, international research into the nature and consequences of change at the post-war interface is now overdue. Several important areas for investigation are readily identifiable. For example, the impact of the economic recovery of the 1970s and 1980s on city-ports is obvious, as also the influence of the environmental movement on port development in the late twentieth century. However, perhaps the most striking developments in recent years has been the importance of government intervention and decaying waterfront areas. Throughout the world, but especially in advanced countries, there has been a spectacular transformation of many such locations that was at once conscious almost immediately twenty years ago. This wave of revitalisation, regeneration and apparently successful change is now apparent, in fact, across many physical planning, economic and socio-economic challenges, and it is no more than the present volume focuses.

Indeed has already been written about port cities in transition, and about the particular problems of planning problems associated with the waterfront-redevelopment movement. In North America, where waterfront revitalisation has become well-established in the 1970s, the movement has engendered a substantial literature in the fields of urbanisation, planning and urban design. This trend has also become very apparent in Western Europe in the 1970s, especially in the United Kingdom, and it is now spreading rapidly elsewhere in the world. Political scientists, geographers and economists have not been slow to respond and comment on the change taking place in specific areas and locations.
