COVID brain fog is a 'true neurologic condition'

Impaired cognitive associated with COVID-19 appears to have a biological basis, research suggests. Neurologists found abnormalities in cerebrospinal fluid (CSF) and other cell factors, including cytokines and lipoproteins, present in individuals with mild COVID-19 accompanying persistent cognitive problems often referred to as "brain fog."

"We're seeing changes in the CSF in the brain of some people after their cognitive changes," said James Hollman, MD, assistant professor of neurology, Memory and Aging Center, University of California San Francisco, and lead researcher. "We're just at the beginning, though. I hope this study will provide some legitimacy to this being a true neurologic condition."

The study was published online Jan. 24 in Strokes of Clinical and Translational Neurology.

Key points

There is currently no guideline on how to identify patients with COVID-related cognitive changes, said Dr. Hollman. "The term 'brain fog' is not based in science or medicine, but that's the name created to let us start to write this."

The analysis included adults with confirmed SARS-CoV-2 infection who reported long-term cognitive impairment in the Long-term Impact of Infection with Novel Coronavirus study.

Intra-arterial tPA after thrombectomy: 'Remarkable' benefit

Giving intravenous alteplase to patients with acute ischemic stroke led to a large increase in the number of patients achieving excellent neurologic outcome at 90 days in a new study.

The phase 2b-ONNCT study was powered at the International Stroke Consortium (ISC) 3402 by David Chaturvedi, MD, University of Minnesota, who studied a trial of alteplase in the weeks after stroke. The study was also published online in Stroke in parallel with the presentation at the ESC.

The study results showed a statistically and significantly 58.4% absolute increase in the number of patients achieving an excellent neurologic outcome, defined as modified Rankin Scale (mRS) score of 1-2, after treatment with intravenous alteplase immediately following thrombectomy. This was despite the fact that the study was stopped early because of difficulty
