The scientific study of humans, their cultures, and the societies in which they live is known as social anthropology. The truth about the state of society's affairs is what we hope to learn as a result of this. It works to improve people's skill sets so that they can have more fulfilling lives as a result. The application of the scientific method is necessary for this purpose. If there is such a thing as a science, then there must also be a technique.

Theory, methodology, and data are interdependent. Learning about society can be accomplished through social anthropology using its well-developed approach. The methodology of fieldwork, which serves as the central organising principle of social anthropology, is what distinguishes this study within the sphere of the social sciences as a whole. The method is in the logic. When confronted with a challenge, anthropologists attempt to find a logical solution to the issue at hand. In a nutshell, they arrive to an explanation that makes logical sense for the issue. They dispute about the various logical approaches that might be taken to the problem in order to achieve the goal that is wanted. This line of reasoning is what ultimately results in the realisation of the goals of logic, which are to present the research problem. In a nutshell, a method is the rationale behind an investigation; it is the role that plays in reaching a goal.

Fieldwork and an empirical tradition have always been important components of social anthropological research. This is one of the discipline's defining qualities. It began with the trip stories written by travellers who had been journeying to remote parts of the globe for approximately 400 years, since "the age of Columbus." These travel accounts gave the early social anthropologists with the fundamental data that they needed, as was previously mentioned. The information that was obtained by these explorers, missionaries, and government officials was extremely helpful in enlightening other Europeans about the diverse forms that human life can take across the globe.
