Introduction

Nigeria is a secular and heterogeneous society. There are over 250 ethnic configurations in the Nigerian federation. Since the creation of the country, the cultural, ideological, and religious differences of the Nigerian peoples have put them asunder despite the amalgamation of 1914. Overtime, in the historical development of the nation-state, ethnicity and regionalism emerged as the bane of the political and economic development of Nigeria. Hence, the pertinent need for Nation building. The task of nation building cannot be the exclusive obligation of the government. The private sector, academia and trained professionals need to synergize with the government, and complement its Nation building efforts. It is without doubt that the process of all and sundry in Nigeria collaborating to build a Nation out of the multifarious peoples of the country is in itself an attainment of nationalism.

Since independence, nation building efforts have suffered many setbacks. Political and economic marginalization and exploitation of the minorities in Nigeria fueled disharmony and agitation for state creation. The destabilizing and destructive effects of these developments in Nigeria bring to the fore the pertinent need for Nation building in the country. It is against this background that, this paper examines history, the historian and nation building in post-colonial Nigeria.

This paper maintains that History as an academic discipline and the Historian as a trained professional have crucial roles to play in promoting nation building in post-colonial Nigeria. History is a bridge across time, and the Historian is the engineer behind the construction. The bridge connects or links the past to the present and future, it also connects and interlocks the peoples of Nigeria through the understanding it promotes. (Igbafe, 1986: 2)

Background to Nationalism in Nigeria

According to Onwubiko, nationalism is "Patriotic sentiment or activity on the part of groups of Africans held together by the bonds of common language and
