

Science, Technology and Society: Development as The Survival of Mankind

Introduction

In this society, sustainable development is pivotal for the survival of humankind. As the world population grows exponentially, science is essential to discover new ways to extend the life expectancy of the planet. Innovation disentangles issues in ways that scientists can do multiple studies at a time, but it is important to keep in mind that society and ethics also play an enormous role in the application of science.

Background and STS

It is critical to comprehend the difference between science and technology to provide an individual conviction of whether advancement should proceed. Science is the research and facts behind hypotheses, where technology is the applied science by means of creating products to do so. Science and Technology Studies (STS) combines two main studies, firstly the study of scientific and technological research and practices. Secondly, the study of how society and the environment have an impact on research and development. The situation that remains is a typical STS problem because various uses of technology are not accepted by society and should, therefore, not be practiced. If science and technology do not meet current prerequisites and obligations, it is repelled by society and that determines whether it is lawful to continue with these practices, but that is not generally the case.
