Abstract

This study reveals the complex effects of the government service perception and different types of the comprehensive social public participation on the comprehensive perception of social justice and its sub-dimensions through OLS regression. Specifically, we find that the government service perception exhibits extremely significant and robust positive effects in all models. At the same time, the impact of different types of the comprehensive social public participation on perceptions of social equity shows significant variability. Rights advocacy participation demonstrates a negative effect in the model of the sense of legal and opportunity equality. This finding that suggests we need to further examine and optimize the advocacy mechanisms. The negative role of communication engagement in all sub-dimension models reveals the inadequacy of information transfer and communication mechanisms in building social trust. In contrast, the positive effect of community participation in the model of the sense of legal and opportunity equality highlights the positive role of communities in promoting social fairness, while the overall positive effect of electoral participation, although weakly significant in some sub-dimensions, suggests the potential value of the electoral system in enhancing the sense of social fairness.

Keywords

Comprehensive Perception of Social Justice, comprehensive social public participation, government service perception.

1. Introduction

In the context of social change, the main contradiction in Chinese society has transformed into the contradiction between the growing needs of the people for a better life and the unbalanced and inadequate development. The issue of social equity in the new era has further aroused people's attention to the sense of social equity [1]. Enhancing the people's sense of social justice and meeting their needs for fairness and justice are of great significance to the maintenance of social harmony and stability, as well as to social development and construction. In fact, the influence factors of social fairness and how to promote social fairness have been a topic of academic discussion. Subjective and objective influences such as socioeconomic status, relative deprivation, social cognition, and subjective social class have been discussed in the literature. In terms of social public participation, current research focuses on the impact of micro-areas, but the impact of generalized social public participation behaviors on the sense of social equity has rarely been explored by scholars. Social public participation, i.e. institutionalized political participation, refers to the actions of ordinary citizens who participate in political life through a variety of legitimate means to influence the composition, mode of operation, operating rules and policy processes of the political system [2]. As one of the most basic rights and freedoms enjoyed by citizens, comprehensive social public participation is also one of the most important aspects that reflect the building of democracy, the democratization of politics and social equity.
