

A. MURRAY: Being Unhappy: and Depression: General Aspects and Interrelationships. Springer, New York (1967). pp. vi + 145. DM 75.

This collection of the author's papers could form the basis of endless thoughts about eating and personality. Hundreds of apparently decent Californian undergraduates completed lengthy questionnaires purporting to measure personality and eating behaviour and leading to suspicious correlation matrices and factor analyses from which we are invited to draw conclusions about which eating styles go with which personality. The book depends entirely on self-reported measures of emotional state and behaviour without evidence indicating whether the results are valid in terms of behaviour and mood. The students completed questionnaires as part of their undergraduate course. It is not explained how spending trivial hours completing hundreds of semantic differentials contributed to their education. The subjects' consequent attitudes to their task is unknown, and the results obtained must be treated with a fair degree of circumspection. Some of the names given to factors derived from the analysis, such as 'predisposition to anorexia' and 'predisposition to obesity' indicate that such caution is lacking. Indeed, the former subset showed no correlation with ponderal index and was determined using the means of three scales, totalling 28 items, with no accepted measure of symptoms of anorexia nervosa such as the Ewing Anorexia Test which might have been used to validate the measure.

The book might prove valuable to those who believe that much can be learnt by subjecting large questionnaires to correlation and factor analysis. At the original studies were published in reputable journals, such individuals might not be all that deceived.

PAUL ROBINSON

L. F. FREED and E. M. WAKING (Eds): Marital Therapy in Psychiatric Practice: an Overview. Brunner/Mazel, New York (1987). pp. xiv + 316. $25.00.

This book is based on the proceedings of a 2-day conference held in 1984 at the University of Western Ontario, Canada. The topics covered are: Indications for Marital Therapy; The Initial Interview in Conjugal Therapy; Assessment of Marital Types of Marital Therapy in Psychiatric Practice; Outcome Research, Transference and Countertransference in Marital Therapy; The Relationship of Sexual Therapy to Marital Therapy in Psychiatric Practice; and, Combined Therapies. The format followed is that the lecture is written in chapter form, followed by a respondent's reaction comments and then a transcript of the questions and answer session.

As a clinician particularly involved in family therapy practice, and increasingly so in marital therapy, I approached the text with considerable interest. The added interest was to ask the question: what does a medical psychiatric perspective on marital therapy add for me as a non-medical clinician? As regards this book, the answer was mixed. It is good in parts, but sometimes repetitive as is frequently the case in conference proceedings. Also, the question and answer transcripts are at times rather flat and do not always add substantially to the text.

The chapter on indications for marital therapy was disappointing, being heavy on lists of indications and contraindications and light on discussion. The other chapter I found disappointing was the attempt to integrate the field of combined therapies. However, the chapter dealing with the initial interview provides a useful structure for engaging in marital therapy, and the subsequent chapter on assessment focuses both on the problems of engaging couples as well as the effects this may have on the therapist.

The chapter dealing with transference and countertransference examines these phenomena both from a marital and a family therapy perspective, making useful distinctions. And finally, the chapter looking at the relationship of sexual and marital therapy provides useful pointers for the clinician as to which area should be focused on depending on type of problem presentation.

Although there were frequent references to assessment for major affective disorder, and the use of appropriate medication, it seemed that this was often an area where there was disagreement about procedure. There was a general lack of examination of the context for depression in the text and a consideration that severe depressive or other symptomatic behaviour may be functional for a particular marital relationship. Some of the contributors showed a surprising lack of awareness of the recursive nature of relationships. The most obvious example is where an interview focused on an older son who had run the family business with parents both described as 'battered' over in a typical depressive posture (p. 183), and a younger brother who was abusing drugs. The author continues:

'After questioning, that revealed major affective disorders in both spouses, it was suggested that both parents might benefit from a trial of antidepressant medication, initiated by the oldest son'.

It appears that 2 weeks later 'they were a different family' with father assuming responsibility for the business, the couple being 'spontaneous and bright' and with considerable improvement in both sons. The author concludes: 'One wonders whether it was the family assessment, the medication, the combination, or some other unknown factor that produced this dramatic result' (p. 183).

This excerpt highlights the varying consequences of systemic approaches to therapy, where a structural therapist might talk of intensifying by challenging the family structure, or a strategic therapist might describe the effects of prescribing symptomatic patterns of behaviour in relation to therapeutic change.

In summary, I found parts of this book very useful, showing a wide range of different theoretical approaches, and others surprisingly limited. The chapters would have benefited from being longer, so allowing for more exploration of issues, rather than relying on the question and answer format. And tighter editing would have removed unnecessary repetition which is to be expected in a single theme conference which is not advantageous in book form. This is a useful text for those interested in learning something about marital therapy, but rather light for anyone already familiar with the field.
