

proportion respond positively. Producers of skin care products are well aware that many women report that they are intolerant to a variety of cosmetic formulations, citing sunscreens, fragrances, and moisturizers as most often troublesome. By "sensitive skin" some respondents mean any adverse event including various rashes, breakouts, and assorted visible dermatoses, mainly focused on the face (1). A sizeable number of women with self-assessed "sensitive skin" record a variety of purely subjective discomforts that occur in the absence of clinical signs. These include stinging, burning, itching, tightness, and other vague sensations.

The question arises regarding the credibility of these assessments, especially the sub-clinical neurosensory reactions. Among the pressing issues are: Can women with sensitive skin be identified by clinical examinations? Is there a recognizable phenotype such as oily, dry, or photodamaged skin? What tests are available to validate the presence of sensitive skin? Should pre-marketing surveys of new skin care products be carried out in panels of women who have been objectively identified as having sensitive skin?

We examined the sensitivity of chemical probes to assess the prevalence and severity of sensitive skin.

MATERIALS AND METHODS

Approximately 1000 adult white females (ages 18 to 65) were recruited from five geographically diverse locations in the North American continent: Arizona, Ohio, New Jersey, Manitoba, and Florida. This study compared the responses of two populations who by self-assessments perceived themselves to have sensitive or non-sensitive skin to three chemical probes, each of which elicited characteristic reactions. In each test site approximately 200 women participated, 40% of whom had sensitive skin while 60% were non-sensitive. There was an attempt to enroll 50% from each group.

At the first visit each subject answered a 20-item questionnaire that specifically asked, "Do you have sensitive skin?" and gave a detailed account of adverse reactions to facial skin care products. Applications of the chemical probes were randomized to opposite sides of the face. There were three visits at least two days apart, with one probe being applied at one time.

The three chemical probes were applied on separate visits in accordance with the methods outlined below see (Figure 1). A script was provided to standardize the wording used when communicating with the subjects regarding subjective responses. Burning/stinging responses were recorded each minute for up to ten minutes, utilizing the following grading scale: 0 = none, 1 = mild, 2 = moderate, 3 = severe. The endpoints for analysis were (a) time in minutes to perceived burning/stinging and (b) maximum score achieved.

STATISTICAL ANALYSIS

The data used in the statistical analysis were the times to perceive the specified sensory response and the maximum score achieved. Student's t-test was used to establish whether there were statistically significant differences to each of the three probes between the two groups (sensitive vs non-sensitive) at the 0.05% level.

nuclear proliferation defense strategy or international security Matthew Kroenig points out that nearly every country with a nuclear weapons arsenal received substantial help at some point from a more advanced nuclear state Why do some countries help others to develop nuclear weapons Many analysts assume that nuclear transfers are driven by economic considerations States in dire economic need they suggest export sensitive nuclear materials and technology and ignore the security risk in a desperate search for hard currency Kroenig challenges this conventional wisdom He finds that state decisions to provide sensitive nuclear assistance are the result of a coherent strategic logic The spread of nuclear weapons threatens powerful states more than it threatens weak states and these differential effects of nuclear proliferation encourage countries to provide sensitive nuclear assistance under certain strategic conditions Countries are more likely to export sensitive nuclear materials and technology when it would have the effect of constraining an enemy and less likely to do so when it would threaten themselves In Exporting the Bomb Kroenig examines the most important historical cases including France's nuclear assistance to Israel in the 1950s and 1960s the Soviet Union's sensitive transfers to China from 1958 to 1960 China's nuclear aid to Pakistan in the 1980s and Pakistan's recent technology transfers with the help of rogue scientist A Q Khan from 1987 to 2002 Understanding why states provide sensitive nuclear assistance not only adds to our knowledge of international politics but also aids in international efforts to control the spread of nuclear weapons Bulletin, 1944 Stabilization and Solidification of Hazardous, Radioactive, and Mixed Wastes Roger D.
