

Igneous Rocks

Igneous rocks are created from magma, which is molten rock. The name itself tells you it's liquid, which is where the word igneous gets its name. Igneous rocks can be formed in two different ways: under the Earth's surface (intrusive) or above the Earth's surface (extrusive) (these kinds of rocks intrude) or above the Earth's surface (extrusive) (these kinds of rocks intrude).

There are many different types of igneous rock. Some of the most common are basalt, andesite, rhyolite, granite, gneiss, and obsidian.

Basalt

Basalt is one of the most common types of igneous rock. It has a dark, glassy look, and it is the second (second) of all the common igneous rocks. Basalt is formed from extremely hot, molten magma that erupts from a volcano. Basalt is usually found in the form of small, dark, angular fragments, which help explain how hot and how the magma flows.

Andesite

Andesite is a medium-gray, blocky rock, it formed by erupting intermediate-magma (the middle way between). This kind of volcano has a magma chamber that is a little closer to the surface than most volcanoes. The magma from this volcano is a little more viscous (sticky) and is hot. This means the rock is firm and makes a strong sound.

Rhyolite

Rhyolite is a light-colored and generally lighter in weight than other igneous rocks. Rhyolite is formed from the eruption of a volcano. The magma chamber of a volcano is located close to the Earth's surface, and the magma that erupts is hot and sticky. The magma that erupts from the volcano, making it harder to erupt. Rhyolite is a well-known type of igneous rock.

Igneous Rocks

Basalt

Basalt is an intrusive or plutonic igneous rock. This means it is created by molten magma under the surface of the Earth. Basalt is formed by slowly cooling magma, which forms large crystals in it. Basalt can look quite different depending on the different shapes and colors of the crystals that are formed.

Andesite

Andesite is usually a volcanic glass. It is usually dark and very shiny. Because there are that much more viscosity, forms andesite. It is a dark rock because there is no gas in water in the lava when it solidifies. Andesite is usually formed when a volcano erupts.

Rhyolite

Rhyolite is one of the most common rocks you may find, and you might not even think it is a rock! It is very light and full of holes. Rhyolite is a type of igneous. It forms when very hot magma quickly, trapping air inside. Rhyolite is found often in volcanic regions.

Volcanic Rocks

Lake Taupō is the center of New Zealand's most important lake. It is also a volcanic volcano.

When Lake Taupō erupted around 1800 years ago, its eruption was so big that the forests and fields were not saved from the ash that it threw into the sky. That means that the ash from the volcano must have covered the whole forest.

Volcanic eruptions and hot lava flows can cause a lot of damage to the surface, making it difficult for people to pass through.
