The Historical Approach to New Testament Rhetorical Criticism: A Rhetorical Analysis of 1 Corinthians 15

Timothy J. Christian

Abstract: The historical approach to New Testament rhetorical criticism uses ancient Greco-Roman rhetorical theory and practice to better understand the rhetoric and rhetorical context of the New Testament. Since most Bible scholars and students are unfamiliar with ancient Greco-Roman rhetoric, this article summarizes and explains Greco-Roman rhetoric in an accessible way so that non-experts can understand and apply the historical method of New Testament rhetorical criticism. It provides a rigorous step-by-step process for doing rhetorical analysis followed by a rhetorical analysis of 1 Corinthians 15 as an example of the method. This analysis displays Paul's rhetorical prowess in 1 Corinthians 15 and demonstrates that Paul had more than a passing familiarity with Greco-Roman rhetoric. Overall, this article shows that rhetorical criticism is an indispensable and essential tool needed in the arsenal of biblical exegetes for understanding the New Testament in its original contexts.

1. Introduction to Rhetorical Criticism

Rhetorical criticism means several things to several people in the field of biblical studies today. There is a wide range of approaches to this method, but the focus of this article will be upon the historical or diachronic approach to rhetorical criticism, sometimes called socio-rhetorical criticism.¹ This historical approach to rhetorical criticism analyzes the NT using Greco-Roman rhetoric, and of the many approaches today, it is the most helpful for exegesis because it draws out the type of persuasion that was actually used during the time of the NT. This approach has a long history in the interpretation of the Bible as it dates back to many early church fathers such as Origen, the Cappadocians, John Chrysostom, and Augustine to name a few (Witherington 2015, p. 65; Classen 2000, p. 175; Black 2010, p. 169). Practitioners of this approach today are Hans Dieter Betz, Margaret M. Mitchell, George A. Kennedy, Duane F. Watson, Ben Witherington III, and Timothy J. Christian. In short, the historical methodology of rhetorical criticism is “the historical endeavor of analyzing the Bible by means of Greco-Roman rhetorical conventions. . . by comparing the NT texts to both ancient rhetorical theory. . . and ancient rhetorical practice” (Christian 2023, p. 47).

Unfortunately, many NT rhetorical critics from this historical vantage point have not been altogether unified in their methodology.² Some scholars are more regimented than others in employing the method, but a methodological procedure is lacking amongst many works of NT rhetorical criticism today. Thus, the purpose of this article will be to provide a rigorous step-by-step process for interpreting and analyzing the rhetoric of the NT from the historical, Greco-Roman standpoint.³ This will include (1) an explanation of Greco-Roman rhetoric, (2) a procedure for employing the method of historical rhetorical criticism, and (3) then applying this method to a NT text as an example, namely, to 1 Cor 15 in particular and broadly to 1 Corinthians as a whole.
