The Death in all Things Christopher Byford. Fear takes many forms. Ringed by an immense wall, the gothic city of Obellium has been ostracised by its neighbours. Here, those with money prosper, living in security and comfort. Those without are relegated to the smog-drenched working districts, dying by the score via poverty and illness. For the homeless children like Frederick, life is a free-for-all. Living in an alleyway with other youngsters, all are fearful of the Gaslight Terror, a serial killer of urban legend who stalks the city without prejudice. To earn enough to eat, Frederick resorts to shining shoes outside a nearby train station. In an insurmountable act of kindness, the young boy is gifted a toy teddy bear by one of his customers. Returning to what he calls home that night, the toy transforms into an indescribable horror, and it's only the intervention of the Gaslight Terror himself that ensures that Frederick remains in the land of the living. With blunderbuss in hand, the stranger Samuel reveals that the creature is a Mimic, a beast that can adopt the form of any object, and he has been hunting them. Considerably shaken, Frederick can do nothing else but obsess over the revelation he's witnessed. With his friend murdered by one of these creatures, Frederick follows Samuel to his hideout, an apothecary shop run by his wife, to demand answers. With the alarming disclosure that the creature was gifted, Samuel strikes a deal with the youngster, taking him on as his apprentice to rid the city of Mimics for good. With a rash of high-profile murders rocking the city's aristocrats, the pair must unravel their connection to the Mimics and uncover a conspiracy that is slowly bringing the city closer to destruction. But those responsible have noticed, and such grand designs are not so easily swayed from their path.
