Abstract

Research has shown that gender role attitudes develop during adolescence; however, the relevant predictors remain a matter of debate. In adolescence, the school environment gains in importance. Thus, the present study investigates how students' and especially teachers' culture and composition predict the development of gender role attitudes in young adolescents. The study addresses this question using a sample of 7360 Flemish students (44.8% girls), who were surveyed three times after entering secondary education between 2012 ($M_{age} = 13.14$, $SD = 0.56$) and 2014. Latent change models reveal that boys' initial gender role attitudes are associated with the students' gender role culture; however, boys with more traditional gender role attitudes do not develop in an even more traditional direction at the beginning of secondary education. In contexts with a more privileged student SES composition, boys develop less traditional attitudes, while a traditional gender role culture among teachers supports the development of more traditional gender role attitudes among boys. Girls with more traditional gender role attitudes find themselves within student contexts with a more traditional culture. However, the development does not vary with the students' gender role culture. Overall, boys seem more susceptible to students' cultural and compositional characteristics.

Introduction

Attitudes towards gender roles and how they are lived out are subject to change, both at the societal level and at the level of the individual life course (e.g., Dotti Sani & Quaranta, 2017). Adolescents' gender role attitudes are especially amenable to development, as gender-related constructs are salient during adolescence; this is because teenagers are experiencing biological, cognitive and social changes that can affect their attitudes (e.g., Ruble & Martin, 2006). Despite the relevance of these processes, few studies have examined the development of gender role attitudes during adolescence and relevant predictors of this development, while the findings are quite contradictory. Research has shown that parents' gender role attitudes and socioeconomic status (SES) are relevant predictors of the extent of traditional gender role attitudes (Halimi et al., 2016). However, they are less suitable to predict the development of these attitudes (e.g., Halimi et al., 2021; Ullrich et al., 2022). It is generally known that the importance of the family context decreases during adolescence, and the importance of peer groups and the school context increases (Halimi et al., 2021). Nevertheless, there is very little, if any, research that deals with the school contexts' impact on the development of gender role attitudes, although the school context is perceived as a critical
