Abstract: The authors report on the development of a writing curriculum for children in the 10 years following the implementation of a series of state and federal policies and as a result of a series of research studies. The curriculum is based on the authors' research on the development of writing in children and on the research of other scholars. The curriculum is designed to be used by teachers in the classroom and to be adapted to the needs of individual students. The curriculum is based on the following principles: (1) writing is a social activity; (2) writing is a process; (3) writing is a means of communication; (4) writing is a means of learning; (5) writing is a means of self-expression; (6) writing is a means of problem-solving; (7) writing is a means of creating a record; (8) writing is a means of creating a community; (9) writing is a means of creating a culture; (10) writing is a means of creating a future.
