

Connie's Catalog Column

Guest column by Nina Biddle, Sociology

May 4, 1992

Recently there was a request in the Sociology Department for the I Ching—an ancient Chinese text among the Confucian classics. Material on the I Ching classes primarily is in the Literature and Sociology Departments, but I found it interesting that A/M/F, History and even Business have something on it, too. A minor problem with our search reminded us of a characteristic of online searching in the catalog.

A standard title search in CAT (tl/i ching) will retrieve a portion (22) of the titles the library owns; a keyword search using the Boolean function should take you one step further and retrieve everything. If you enter i-ching in Option 1 you will retrieve 34 citations. However, if you happen to try a keyword search in the title index of the SRC screen (Option 2) the message you receive is, "No citations found." Our reliance on stopwords explains this inconsistency.

In the staff catalog training sessions we briefly discussed the use of stopwords for Boolean/keyword searching. Everyone should have received the 3 pages of stopwords used in each of the indexed fields: subject, author, and title. (If you don't have copies and would like them, contact Dave Klaiber in the Catalog Department.) Stopwords are those words eliminated from the search string in an effort to increase efficiency. They are words that occur frequently in our language and, therefore, slow down response time when they are included in a keyword search. A few examples of stopwords in our catalog's title index are: I, a, an, and, are, also, yours, report, association, proceedings. It is not necessary for you, as a searcher, to know which words are stopwords. If you have included one in your search, the computer does not search it. Results can sometimes be skewed, however, if a stopword is included, so it is to your benefit to be aware of them and avoid using them. Since "I" is a title index stopword, the combined keyword search of I and ching will not retrieve anything. Hence, "No citations found."

When you search for the I Ching in Option 1 (all fields) on the SRC screen, the 34 citations you retrieve are actually all pulled from the subject index. The subject heading assigned to the work is: I Ching. If you do a regular subject search (sub/i ching) you will also retrieve 34 citations. To conclude, the word "I" is a stopword in the title index, but not in the subject index, which explains why the search is successful part of the time, but not all of the time.

One final point: The keyword search described above does not actually retrieve all relevant materials. It only retrieves those catalog records with the I Ching subject heading assigned (34). If you try another title search on the SRC screen (Option 2) by eliminating the "I" and searching only the word "ching," you will retrieve 110 citations. Obviously you will get titles not pertinent
