

Earliest Times – part two

1

In 1413, Henry V and Parliament legislated that: “all the Church livings in England held by aliens², except those specially named, should be seized into the King’s hands.”³ This act allowed the King to take ownership of any benefices owned by foreign nationals; he could then raise funds by selling the advowsons when they became vacant, through death, resignation or advancement of the sitting vicar.

In 1440, King Henry VI founded Eton College (and King’s College) – a religious community of priests, lay brothers and boy choristers. Minor royals and other nobles sought to emulate the King and so Colleges, as they were called, sprung up in many far flung places. Tattershall College was founded in 1460. A College consisted of a Church and residential quarters with sufficient land to provide an income to cover its expenditure. Its purpose was to provide a sacred space for: the tombs of its founders and for the priests and choristers to intercede through song for the founder’s prosperity in life and quick release from purgatory after death.

By the end of the Hundred Years war⁴ (1453), “English music, with its particular harmonies and sonorities, known as the ‘contenance angloise’, set the fashion for the rest of Europe, and English choirs were marvelled at for their technical skills and virtuosity at either end of the scale: for their magnificent bases, on the one hand, and their boy trebles on the other, who sang fiendishly difficult polyphony at sight and improvised descant to plainsong with equal facility.”⁵ This soaring music required a soaring auditorium to enable it to fully be appreciated; and so, the “perpendicular” style was developed by engineers to ensure the spine tingling experience for listeners that only this glorious music can cause. Indeed, Morton Church with its perpendicular clerestory, built in the fifteen century, was part of this movement and considering the expense of the alterations must have had the musical talent to justify it.

Nationally, the fifteenth century was dominated by the Wars of the Roses.
