

The first of these is the fact that the landmass is not a simple, regular shape. It is irregular, with many small, sharp points and indentations. This suggests that it is not a simple, flat, rectangular object, but rather a complex, three-dimensional structure. The second fact is that the landmass is light-colored, which is unusual for a body of water. This suggests that it is composed of a material that is lighter in color than the surrounding water, such as sand or coral. The third fact is that the landmass is in the middle of a dark blue body of water, which is also unusual. This suggests that the landmass is not a simple, flat, rectangular object, but rather a complex, three-dimensional structure.
