

Review Essay:

Turning Teaching Tools Into Assessment Instruments

Karen L. Greenberg
Hunter College of The City University of New York

Laurel Black, Donald A. Daiker, Jeffrey Sommers, and Gail Stypall, Eds. New Directions in Portfolio Assessment: Reflective Practice, Critical Theory, and Large-Scale Scoring. Portsmouth, NH: Boynton/Cook Publishers, 1994. 367 pages.

In the last issue of Assessing Writing, two of the editors of New Directions in Portfolio Assessment (Laurel Black and Jeff Sommers, along with their colleague, Edwina Helton) wrote an essay about portfolio assessment which described the problems in defining and comparing "authentic assessment" and "performance assessment" in writing. In addition to explaining and critiquing portfolio assessment, the authors provided an insightful analysis of the validity, reliability, and equity of portfolios as assessment instruments. Their essay is required reading for teachers, administrators, and researchers struggling to develop or refine the ways in which their schools or programs evaluate students' writing processes and written work. Interestingly, however, the essay poses more questions than it answers. For example, here is the problematic contradiction with which the authors end the essay:

Different kinds of "expertise" and knowledge are pitted against each other, the expert knowledge we have as educators about the students in our classrooms, their lives, our goals, the skills and abilities we want to measure, and the behaviors and "habits of mind" we want to support conflict at many levels with the expertise of psychometricians who need to find ways to fit large numbers of students from many contexts into rigid paradigms. At the moment, there is no bridge between the two. (Black, Helton, & Sommers, 1994, p. 365)

New Directions in Portfolio Assessment attempts to create this bridge.
