The frontiers of knowledge management

Kevin C. Desouza

The Information School, University of Washington, Seattle, Washington, USA

Abstract

Purpose – This paper seeks to discuss the new frontiers of knowledge management research.

Design/methodology/approach – The paper is based on the author's experiences of putting together a compilation of writings by scholars on the future of knowledge management.

Findings – The paper outlines a research agenda for knowledge management.

Originality/value – The paper sheds light on critical problems that need to be examined in order to advance the field of knowledge management. Current scholars and students in the area of knowledge management can gain from the insights presented here.

Keywords Knowledge management, Sciences, Research

Paper type Viewpoint

In this perspective paper, I would like to share my thoughts on how might we seek out the new frontiers of knowledge management. This paper is based on my keynote talk at the Second International Conference on Knowledge Management (Charlotte, North Carolina, October, 2005) and my introductory comments in my edited collection, New Frontiers of Knowledge Management (Desouza, 2005). A frontier is a new field for exploration or developmental activity. Is knowledge management a field that is has novelty left in it? A frontier can signify a line of division between different things. Is knowledge management research integrative of theoretical frameworks, learning, and experiences found in different disciplines or is it much of the research silo-based? Finally, a frontier can mean the furthestmost limits. Have we reached the maturation point in terms of research on knowledge management?

Before I make my comments, several caveats need to be noted. First, my intention here is not to criticize the efforts of researchers or their outputs (papers, presentations, or books). Rather, my intention here is to scrutinize and provide some personal reflections. Second, like with all perspective or opinion-based commentary, each reader will have a chance to either agree or disagree with the comments that follow. I encourage the debate on these issues to be carried out, so please do be vocal. Third, and final, I am guilty of most of the things that I outline below, and hence by writing this paper, I hope to use it as a litmus test for the kind of future research projects that I engage in.

A field of exploration or developmental activity

The field of knowledge management continues to witness exponential growth. Since the days of seminal writings by scholars and practitioners, such as Ikujiro Nonaka and Hirotaka Takeuchi, Thomas Davenport and Larry Prusak, John-Christopher Spender, Robert Grant, Georg von Krogh, and others, we have seen an entire discipline emerge.
