

PULSE RADIOLYSIS

- In pulse radiolysis short electron pulses, accelerated to several MeV, are directed to the sample to initiate chemical reactions. The time dependence of build-up and decay of intermediates are followed by various detection systems. Most often used technique is the optical detection.
- In optical detection the intermediates are observed by their light absorptions.
- The setup is composed of two parts, first part, including light source for sample illumination, lens system, shutter preventing heating and photolysis of sample, light filters, and the measuring cell itself, is housed in the irradiation room. The other parts are outside the radiation shielding and Faraday cage protecting against electromagnetic interference.
