Accessible Summary

What is known on the subject?

- To date, the majority of the research regarding innovative psychosocial interventions in psychiatry focuses upon the development and effectiveness of the interventions. Despite the fact that these are important clinical and scientific contributions, only a small percentage of the evidence-based interventions reach clinical practice.
- Cognitive Adaptation Training (CAT) is an effective psychosocial intervention to increase daily functioning and cognitive functioning in people diagnosed with severe mental illness (SMI) in inpatient and outpatient psychiatric care.
- Despite knowledge on the intervention's effectiveness, systematic use of CAT in the daily routine of mental health nurses is insufficient.

What the paper adds to existing knowledge?

- To date, no research is available that describes the factors associated to the implementation of CAT from a nursing perspective.
- This research also adds to the literature on rehabilitation in people diagnosed with SMI in an inpatient setting.
- The results contribute to the science of implementing interventions in long-term psychiatric care and may help future interventions in their implementation process.

What are the implications for practice?

- This study highlights that multiple factors need to be considered when implementing an intervention in routine care and that it is a complicated process.
- Future implementation initiatives require ongoing training and supervision of CAT specialists, appointment of local champions to increase commitment among nursing staff and inclusion and commitment of management to overcome organizational barriers.

This study is registered at the Netherlands Trial Register (identifier: NTR6006). Date registered: 12 February 2012.
