

THE HARP

Of ancient origin, only in recent times has it been able to correspond fully with the exigencies of modern musical art.⁽¹⁾

This occurred with the application of the pedal, which it lacked previously.

This deficiency was eliminated when the Bavarian luteist Hochbrucker (1720) added some pedals to a slipper which, when moved by the tip of the feet, put in motion rods concealed in the column, activating discs that altered the strings.

This not only freed the movement of the hands and fingers, but one was able to alter string intonation by a semitone.

Several decades later Nadermann and the Cousineau brothers altered the mechanics. Finally in 1810 Sebastian Erard perfected the double action, thus creating an alteration of two semitones for every note.

This made the harp without pedals (chromatic harp) obsolete, in spite of a brief comeback attempted by Gustave Lyon a few years ago that was unsuccessful because of the poor tone quality and the difficulty of the technique due to the arrangement of crossed strings.

The pedal harp today responds to all the exigencies of the modern orchestra with its multiple coloristic resources and variety, but also to composers who can treat it as a solo instrument.

The harp now has its own literature of singular value and already eminent composers have written original pieces, enriching the repertoire with very important pieces.⁽²⁾

The largest harp today has an extension of 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ octaves.

To guide the hand of the performer, the DO strings are colored in red and those of FA in blue.

The first two low notes (do and re) are not, however, subject to the mechanics, and it is therefore necessary, before performing, to tune them to the pitch you will use during the execution of the piece.
