PATHOPHYSIOLOGY OF DIAGNOSIS
Cerebral Palsy Cerebral Palsy CP affects the ability to balance and maintain posture. According to the CDC, "Cerebral Palsy is the most common motor disability in childhood." There are multiple types of CP the most common type is Spastic Cerebral Palsy. Characterized by muscle stiffness in the lower extremities, upper extremities are rarely affected. The legs often turn inward and cross at the knee, as well as tightness in the hip. This makes it difficult for the patient to walk, they often need assistance and require wheelchairs. Diagnosis Looking at laboratory values can be helpful to determine a person's overall health. A creatine phosphokinase or CPK can help detect injury within the brain, heart, and skeletal muscles. High levels of CPK3 indicate muscle injury and can help with the diagnosis of CP. Cerebral Palsy can be screened through genetic testing. Diagnosis may take a few months after birth. The child's development will need to be monitored and assessed. Often the patient is referred to a specialist such as a neurologist, a developmental specialist, and or rehabilitation specialist. CP often affects vision and hearing.
