Louisa Pallant - Original Edition Henry James,2020-11-16 Never say you know the last words about any human heart I was once treated to a revelation which startled and touched me in the nature of a person with whom I had been acquainted well as I supposed for years whose character I had had good reasons heaven knows to appreciate and in regard to whom I flattered myself I had nothing more to learn It was on the terrace of the Kursaal at Homburg nearly ten years ago one beautiful night toward the end of July I had come to the place that day from Frankfort with vague intentions and was mainly occupied in waiting for my young nephew the only son of my sister who had been entrusted to my care by a very fond mother for the summer I was expected to show him Europe only the very best of it and was on his way from Paris to join me The excellent band discoursed music not too abstruse while the air was filled besides with the murmur of different languages the smoke of many cigars the creak on the gravel of the gardens of strolling shoes and the thick tinkle of beer glasses There were a hundred people walking about there were some in clusters at little tables and many on benches and rows of chairs watching the others as if they had paid for the privilege and were rather disappointed I was among these last I sat by myself smoking my cigar and thinking of nothing very particular while families and couples passed and repassed me
