

AROUSAL THEORY OF MOTIVATION

The arousal theory of motivation argues that people are highly motivated to maintain an optimal level of arousal at all times.

DEFINITION

According to this theory, people tend to be motivated to increase or decrease their arousal levels with the goal of creating a perfect balance for themselves. When arousal states are insufficient, a person might pursue various invigorating activities to boost arousal. When arousal states are excessive, a person will try to calm themselves to diminish arousal.

EXAMPLES

- The thrill seeker: A person who wants to maintain a high optimal arousal level needs exciting or more extreme activities to satiate their appetite (e.g., bungee jumping, mountain climbing, skydiving).
- The urge to meditate: Choosing to meditate to lower your arousal levels, calm your mind, and relax.
