Religion and Coping in Mental Health Care Joseph Pieper, Marinus van Uden, 2005-01-01 Joseph Pieper and Marinus van Uden have proposed a book consisting of previously published papers on the topics of religion coping and mental health care It covers quite a bit of territory the complex relationships between religion and mental health surveys that present the views of therapists and patients about the interface between religion and mental health a case study of a religious patient struggling with psychological problems empirical studies of religious coping among various groups and a method for teaching the clinical psychology of religion Although the papers are diverse they are unified by several themes First the papers convey a balanced approach to religion and psychology They speak to the potentially positive and negative contributions religion can make to health and well being Second several of the papers focus on the role of religious coping among patients in the Netherlands This focus is noteworthy since the large majority of this theory and research has been limited to the USA Third they underscore the value of a cross cultural approach to the field Their surveys point to the importance of religious worldview perspectives to many patients and therapists in the Netherlands even though the culture is more secularised than the USA However their papers also suggest that the manifestation of these religious worldview perspectives may take different shape in the Netherlands Fourth the papers have clinical relevance The case history of the obsessive compulsive patient by Van Uden ch 4 contains an excellent example of the way in which religious resources can be accessed to counter dysfunctional behaviours This volume shows initial effort in a newly emerging area of study It is encouraging to see a significant body of research and practice on the psychology of religion and coping coming out of the Netherlands It could stimulate further advances in a more cross culturally sensitive clinical psychology of religion Kenneth Pargament Professor of Psychology Bowling Green State University in Ohio USA

Religion, Personality, and Mental Health Laurence B. Brown, 2012-12-06 LAURENCE B BROWN Nearly all the papers in this collection were prepared initially by a group of psychologists interested in the social scientific study of religion They included some working with the mentally ill in medical religious or secular contexts as well as teachers and researchers in psychology or theology Their papers aim to test or to reflect on common prejudices about the links between mental health and religion especially when they are thought to be mediated by personality characteristics All the papers have been revised for this collection A clear consensus emerged that religion has many positive effects despite Wulff's 1991 p 307 unguarded assertion that without question the mentally disturbed are frequently attracted by religion Any assumption that religion is necessarily a danger to health or closely related to mental illness is not supported by the evidence from carefully controlled studies that follow a social science perspective Malony's paper page 16 in this collection therefore emphasizes that we must take account of the ways in which anyone's religion is integrated into their life the functions it serves for them and their acceptance by other members of the religious and other groups to which they belong
