

Critical ethnography: An under-used research methodology in neuroscience nursing

By Cheryl Ross, RN, PhD, Cath Rogers, RN, PhD, and Diane Duff, RN, PhD

Abstract

Critical ethnography is a qualitative research method that endeavours to explore and understand dominant discourses that are seen as being the 'right' way to think, see, talk about or enact a particular 'action' or situation in society and recommended ways to re-address social power inequities. In health care, vulnerable populations, including many individuals who have experienced neurological illnesses or injuries that leave them susceptible to the influence of others, would be suitable groups for study using critical ethnography methodology. Critical ethnography has also been used to study workplace culture. While ethnography has been effectively used to underpin other phenomena of interest to neuroscience nurses, only one example of the use of critical ethnography exists in the published literature related to neuroscience nursing. In our "Research Corner" in this issue of the Canadian Journal of Neuroscience Nursing (CJNN) our guest editors, Dr. Cheryl Ross and Dr. Cath Rogers will briefly highlight the origins of qualitative research, ethnography, and critical ethnography and describe how they are used and, as the third author, I will discuss the relevance of critical ethnography findings for neuroscience nurses.

L'ethnographie critique: une méthodologie de recherche sous-employée dans le domaine des soins infirmiers en neuroscience

Résumé

L'ethnographie critique est une méthode de recherche qualitative qui vise à étudier et comprendre les discours dominants considérés comme la « bonne » façon de penser, de voir, de parler ou de réagir face à une « action » ou une situation particulières dans la société, et à préconiser des manières de rééquilibrer les inégalités en matière de pouvoir social. Dans le milieu des soins de santé, les populations vulnérables, parmi lesquelles de nombreux individus atteints de maladies ou de lésions neurologiques les rendant vulnérables à l'influence d'autres personnes, constitueraient des groupes adéquats pour des études fondées sur la méthodologie de l'ethnographie critique. L'ethnographie critique a également été utilisée pour étudier la culture du lieu de travail. Bien qu'on ait eu recours à l'ethnographie pour appuyer avec succès d'autres phénomènes auquel s'intéresse le personnel infirmier en neurosciences, un seul exemple d'utilisation de l'ethnographie critique a été publié dans la documentation relative aux soins infirmiers en neurosciences. Dans « Le coin de la recherche » de ce numéro du Journal canadien des infirmières et infirmiers en neurosciences (CJNN), les rédactrices invitées Cheryl Ross (Ph. D.) et Cath Rogers (Ph. D.) retraceront brièvement les origines de la recherche qualitative, de l'ethnographie et de l'ethnographie critique, décriront la façon dont on les utilise, et, en tant que troisième auteure, j'aborderai la pertinence des découvertes permises par l'ethnographie critique pour les infirmières et infirmiers en neurosciences.

Germov (2009) noted that the use of statistical, categorical and deductive methodologies for studying nursing practice fails to acknowledge the intuitive and personalized ways of doing nursing that embody many of the central tasks performed. Additionally, the complexity and diversity in the environments where nursing work is undertaken, is not easily translated into quantitative measures. Qualitative methodologies, when used in nursing research, are able to explore such diversity and complexities, through working with people in their natural setting to understand and describe the prevailing culture and social context, in their own language (Denison, 1996).

In choosing a methodology it is important to ensure a fit with the researcher, the participants, and the problem. Roper and Shapira (2000) emphasize synergy between nursing and
