

Problems in Manpower planning

- The lack of sensitivity to problems and solutions
 - Management still seems to be particularly concerned about financial and material resources and has a tendency to neglect the critical factor of human resources.
 - Over the past few decades, productivity has increased as a result of improved technology, but any further improvement will depend, to a very great extent, upon improved manpower utilisation.
 - In this respect, management is required to show a greater respect to the role of manpower in profitability.
